Hill to John W. Sterling

The sender of the telegrams is probably "Hon. Wm. Macdougall, who would be on the wrong side on general principles unless his interest was the other way." Stephen "is making the fight almost single handed... Mr. Van Horne has large capacity for railway affairs and can help Mr. Stephen in many ways, but he has enough to do in his own special department to make his head ache, and would be a better man if he had the support of an able and practical Board. Re Hill's two sons' education and Sterling's interest in helping find the proper tutor for them
